Your site needs a unique personality. In other words, you have to stand out from the competition. Don't look like a copycat. With so many sites available online it may take a little work to really make your site stand out. In order to get your members to continue paying fees every month you must offer something they can't get free somewhere else. In addition to the actual information being important, how you present it to your members is important also. So spend a good amount of time injecting a personality into your site so that they know that they are paying for something that's really worth it. Check out what others in the business have to offer through their membership sites. Don't copy them but adapt from them. Make sure you remain completely focused on your targeted niche. People joined because they wanted more information about your niche. It is best, whenever possible, to stay close to your topic but on occasion it's allowable to offer information that ties into or complements your niche. You really need to make your site the one source for information on your niche that members turn to. It doesn't matter what format the information on your site comes in; it needs to be relevant to your niche. Avoid losing perspective or allowing your site to go off topic. If you aren't giving your members what they signed up for, you risk losing them.

If you want to really generate new ideas for your membership site, then you can start by looking into your own life. Obviously the more you know about a market, the simpler it becomes to create a site around it. Write down your hobbies, areas of expertise, things you're passionate about, etc. It's a lot of work that most people are not willing to do because most are too lazy - and that is the truth. But you're different.

The conclusion is that creating and managing a membership site is the best way to do things. But there are things that you need to keep in mind, which is why you should focus on strengthening your foundation so that you can create a site that actually attracts and keeps members.
